Introduction

Knowledge base is key to functioning of tools enhanced with AI. We develop a list of words and phrases that are related with particular type of messaging in media. An example is a list of key words and phrases that indicate spread of hatred. These lists were be prepared in English and several Danube region languages, Slovenian, Croatian, Hugarian and Romanian. To be able to detect disinformation and hate speech, we assign meaning to what hate speech or disinformation are, using data sets of examples that are labelled hateful or not. The process of developing knowledge base through assigning meaning will based on team work to maintain high level of objectivity.

Data was presented via digital platform and in workshops, organised for development of selected algorithms. These workshops gather experts from different relevant disciplines to develop knowledge base. Knowledge base contains knowledge needed as a learning base required for developing accurate and reliable AI models, which will be the used for the smart recognition of different messages.

Knowledge base combine the experience, needs and knowledge and bridge the gap and reinforce cross-disciplinary links between relevant people of different professional backgrounds for education and training actors, research institutions, media sector and policy makers at all levels. It will thus strengthen the capacities in analysis of media messages, necessary for strengthening media literacy skills.

Knowledge base

Many definitions of hate speech exist. For example, the „UN strategy and plan of action on hate speech” defines it like „any kind of communication in speech, writing or behavior, that attacks or uses pejorative or discriminatory language with reference to a person or a group on the basis of who they are, in other words, based on their religion, ethnicity, nationality, race, color, descent, gender or other identity factor”.

See:

<https://www.un.org/en/genocideprevention/documents/UN%20Strategy%20and%20Plan%20of%20Action%20on%20Hate%20Speech%2018%20June%20SYNOPSIS.pdf>

Going further, Encyclopedia Britannica states „Hate speech, speech or expression that denigrates a person or persons on the basis of (alleged) membership in a social group identified by attributes such as race, ethnicity, gender, sexual orientation, religion, age, physical or mental disability, and others”.

Within the categories „identity factors” and „others” any other attribute shared by groups of people may be included. These are especially cultural categories like beliefs, ideologies, political orientation, and so on. In every day online conversation many times these cultural identity factors of people groups are targets for hate speech.

This Knowledge base brings a hierarchy of categories which describe many types of groups of people within the four target societies (Croatian, Hungarian, Romanian, and Slovenian). By basic linguistic investigations we conclude that there are many people groups beyond the basic ones (such as race, ethnicity, gender, etc.) which are targeted by real hate speech. For example, occupation, economy sector, political and ideological views are often targeting of insulting online communication.

We believe this Knowledge base will serve to structure hate speech more thoroughly than before, and also aid building other linguistic resources such as large-scale hate speech corpora.

Knowledge base elements

The Knowledge base is developed in several iterations. The main category hierarchy was developed, amended by participants from all cultural contexts (Croatian, Hungarian, Romanian, and Slovenian). The category hierarchy was consolidated and cleaned. The process yielded 10 datasets, where for each of the 5 languages (Hungarian, Romanian, Slovenian, Croatian, and English) we have 2 datasets (News portals and Social media).

Data model

There are three main entity types within the Knowledge base:

- Category – denotes abstract categories and concrete hate speech targets
- Term – denotes single words or phrases which refer to concrete categories
- Examples – denotes sentences or paragraphs which address the categories

Each category has its hierarchy, English name, possible translations of the name, description, and a set of attributes with values.

Each term may have the meaning close or identical to one or more categories. More precisely, a term is a word or a phrase in a defined language which denotes the whole or a part of an assignable category of people groups. Also, each term may have translations, word type, and attributes with values (if it is pejorative by default, for example). Term is always given in a normal form (e.g. nominative singular).

Each example has its original text in a chosen language, possible translations, and a set of terms addressing one or many concrete categories. Each triple relation (example, term, category) may have attributes (such as if hate speech is present towards the category, and if the term expressed has a negative sentiment within the text).

Also, there are two secondary entities within the Knowledge base:

- Cultural context – usually a country where the media text is propagated
- Language – language of the text

Each term and example have exactly one original language and one cultural context specified. Each category may have one or more languages and cultural contexts specified.

The main idea behind cultural contexts is that not all categories will be practically (frequently enough) present as hate speech targets across all cultural contexts. Discrimination usually happens towards different minorities within a society. For example, if an ethnicity is not present in a country, most likely it will not be a target for hate speech.

The data was collected manually. The annotators were instructed to find reference sources of online news and their respective social media profiles. Each news document or social media post was manually selected and apriori labelled as positive, negative or neutral regarding the overall sentiment it bears. It was processed in Excel format.

The data was inserted into Text Marker – a software for text annotation. Each dataset has been assigned with 3-4 annotators who labelled the overall sentiment of each text, along with the sentiment phrases which were important for the final sentiment decision. They needed not to label all phrases, just a sample of them (most important by their assessment). Exceptionally, some documents were tagged by multiple sentiment values (ambivalence).

Each data set was divided into two halves. The first half was labelled by all annotators, and the second half was equally divided to be labelled by one annotator. So on a large part of the corpus, all annotators could be assessed on quality.

"headline": "'The Serpent' sinks its teeth in with a true-crime tale set in the 1970s",

"body": "(CNN) Even taking acknowledged creative liberties, the true story at the core of 'The Serpent' sinks its teeth into you, chronicling a murder spree by a slick con man, and the unlikely diplomat whose determined efforts helped apprehend him. Anchored by Tahar Rahim (The Mauritanian), the eight-part series drags in places, but gradually becomes the kind of binge that those who get drawn in might well consume in a weekend. The miniseries mostly works by capturing a very specific time in the 1970s, when hippie backpackers jaunted around Asia, often in need of a friendly face and sympathetic ear as they quested for spiritual enlightenment. Their openness made them easy prey for the suave Charles Sobhraj (Rahim), who, with the complicity of his somewhat-reluctant girlfriend Marie-Andrée Leclerc (Jenna Coleman), befriended them, poisoned them and eventually killed many of them, using their passports and cash to fuel his schemes. The nature of Charles' illicit actions can become a bit murky, but it mostly involves trafficking in gems, cultivating the impression of being a well-to-do operator. When a couple of Danish youths join the ranks of the missing, an employee in the Dutch embassy in Thailand, Herman Knippenberg (Billy Howle), begins seeking answers regarding their whereabouts, turning him into an unlikely sleuth tirelessly tracking Sobhraj's moves. Produced by Netflix with BBC One, the international cast doesn't exactly include a roster of household names, but that heightens the feeling of authenticity, along with a washed-out look that brings a genuine sense of horror to Sobhraj's crimes. Knippenberg, meanwhile, must struggle against bureaucracy not only involving local Thai authorities but officials at his embassy and others, who -- eager not to make waves, and disdainful of the victims -- keep missing opportunities to stop the killings in maddening fashion. Coming after his role in "The Mauritanian," the series provides another strong showcase for Rahim, this time as a ruthless killer completely devoid of empathy, who can seemingly talk anyone out of -- or into -- anything. The show provokes a nagging dread whenever Charles meets a new traveler or one of his adopted beneficiaries begins to harbor doubts about his feigned benevolence. Read More As the somewhat unusual disclaimer notes -- stating that all the dialogue was invented -- writers Richard Warlow and Toby Finlay have embellished the drama, but the bones of the story are accurate enough. The tragic loss of those trusting young souls gives the overall narrative heft, while capturing a cultural moment that extends beyond the standard trashy formula. Granted, there's a sad abundance of serial killers on TV, but seldom a substitute for a good story, reasonably well told. In the broad strokes "The Serpent" resembles any number of true-crime tales, but by meeting those criteria, this limited series still manages to get under your skin. "The Serpent" premieres April 2 on Netflix.

"headline":"Prepare for storms that push your farm to the limit",

"body":"Strengthening your farm for the future is key as you battle weather extremes such as the 2019 bomb cyclone in Nebraska; the 2020 derecho across Iowa; hurricanes; sustained drought; or unseasonably cool, wet weather. The ultimate unknown is Mother Nature, but researchers like Gene Takle, professor emeritus of ag meteorology at Iowa State University, have studied climate change long-term and know its effects on farming. Absolute humidity and nighttime temperatures have increased in all seasons, Takle says. Because of these changes, the growing season is lengthened and more suited to planting seed with longer maturities. The advantage to farmers is higher yields. The increase in rainfall poses challenges during the most vulnerable seasons – spring and fall. “Since the 1980s, we’ve seen remarkable rainfall increases in Iowa during April, May, and June,” Takle says. “In the past two years, we’ve also noted increased rainfall in October and November, which is a pattern we don’t yet understand.” Wet springs mean limited windows to get crops planted. Wet autumns lead to more soil compaction, which affects how the soil performs the following spring. To survive unpredictable storms and adapt to climate change, turn to resources like the University of Nebraska-Lincoln’s (UN-L) Weather Ready Farms program. Weather Ready Farms is a one- or two-year program that helps lower a farmer’s risk to weather losses. It determines what vulnerabilities on the farm can be addressed to better protect land, crops, and finances against weather extremes. Participating farmers in eastern Nebraska fill out a self-assessment, attend educational opportunities, and complete a verification process to achieve the “Weather Ready” designation. “Issues in agriculture like climate variation affect management decisions, the economics of the farm, and also mental health,” says Ashley Mueller, disaster education coordinator at UN-L. Weather Ready Farms evaluates disaster and succession planning, mental wellness, erosion control, water management, variable-rate irrigation, and more. Mueller and other experts at Nebraska Extension have been refining this designation program since 2016. It is designed to provide collaborative learning for farmers with individual recommendations based upon each participant’s operation. Extension professionals and partners review the self-assessment, emphasizing that it’s a guide, not a test. “It isn’t meant to tell someone what they’re doing is wrong,” Mueller explains. “Rather, it helps put the focus where there are opportunities or gaps to overcome.” Mueller says this allows farmers to identify practices they’ve wanted to put in place but haven’t been able to because they lack the capacity. The Extension staff members work specifically on the farmer’s goals and help address the obstacles to adopting new management plans. The second step is education via Extension programs and partner events. Weather Ready Farms currently focuses on crop production, so topics like climate literacy; management of soil, water, pests, and crops; and disaster and emergency planning and preparedness are available. The third step is to prioritize areas on the farm to put new practices into place. These are verified by a third-party provider, and if approved, the farmer receives a Weather Ready Farms designation. Mueller says the current data Weather Ready Farms has collected through the pilot program will help expand its reach. Will Corman is a third-generation farmer near Hardy, Nebraska, and is one of the four farmers in the pilot. “There is no normal year anymore,” Corman says. “The weather is more extreme and unique every year. We look at how to position our farm to better manage the peaks and valleys, and the Weather Ready Farm program provides some insight for us.” Corman’s father, uncle, and cousin work together on nearly 5,000 acres of corn, soybeans, and wheat. They have six center-pivots to irrigate some of the land, and they also run 100 head of fall cow-calf pairs. The farm has been no-till since the late 1990s. Corman’s father and uncle were some of the first farmers in the area to make the switch to conservation tillage. As the Cormans have increased their acres over the years, they’ve made sure to integrate terraces and controlled drainage into their operation. They continually evaluate practices that manage water flow, minimize erosion, and keep nutrients in the fields. In south-central Nebraska, moisture is one of the biggest yield contributors, so any practices that conserve moisture are key. "Uniform crop residue from no-tilling helps us most without sacrificing any moisture," Corman says. "We have a wide-spread spreader on the combine instead of a chopper that evenly throws coarse residue. I've seen how that coarse layer keeps the soil moist and the conditions even compared with a chopper's fine residue strips. The fine strips could cause more variability." The coarse residue is easier to cut through with today's no-till planting and seeding equipment. Nebraska weather, like any state, throws curveballs, and Corman relies on revenue crop insurance to protect the areas where they can't afford to take big risks. Wind and hail insurance also has the potential to further protect against storm damage. "We didn't experience the extremes from the derecho in 2020 like in Iowa, but that same storm damaged about 30% of our acres," Corman says. One of Corman's strategies that made a significant difference protecting his crops from the high winds of the storm was spreading out seed maturities. "As the August storm passed through, two of our fields planted with the same hybrid one week apart, 1 mile apart, withstood the winds very differently," Corman says. "The field planted earlier was fine, but the other was about 50% green-snapped." Corman says every corn plant is susceptible to wind damage depending upon the hybrid. You can't predict where a storm will hit, so he recommends reducing risk by considering each hybrid and spreading out the maturities planted across the farm. "We've planted as low as 101-day corn all the way up to 120-day in the same year. We plant a variety across our fields so we won't have any more than 20% to 30% of our acreage vulnerable at one time," he says. He also employs precision ag technology to strategize crop management decisions and increase efficiency. Corman uses nitrogen inhibitors to prevent volatilization when broadcasting, and he injects concentrated bands to prevent runoff. Corman works to protect his investment and livelihood in the short term, but takes pride in stewardship and the future of the land. "We know we're saving our inputs and protecting the environment now, but the most rewarding part of doing the dirt work and conservation ourselves is shaping that ground for the next generations to come." Instead of jumping into crisis mode after an event, following a specific and structured plan will help you experience less stress and gain efficiency. One plan can be adapted in cases of fire, hail, tornadoes, and so on. Start by answering the following questions: Write the plan and communicate to everyone how to access it when needed. Nathan Mueller, Nebraska Extension cropping systems educator, recommends diversifying your crop rotation to better withstand unpredictable weather. "If you plant only corn and soybeans and experience a drought in July, that hot, dry weather is going to affect both crops," he says. "Instead, if you plant winter wheat or alfalfa, you create a built-in buffer since the weather may not affect those crops in the same way. You could end up with a revenue stream to replace what you lost." Mueller says this strategy is a long-term systems change, but diversification then allows farmers to plant a cover or forage crop and improve the soil quality.",

Semantic challenges and mainstream culture

Consider the following sentence:

„Gamblers are people with a serious problem.“

Are people which are gamblers „denigrated” by this sentence? No, because in developed societies serial gambling is considered an addiction, something negative in mainstream socio-cultural context. So for each concrete category, we have to define if the mainstream culture considers it wrongful or rightful behaviour. Since on many categories there is no clear consensus within a society, we can always make a decision by looking at the enforced legislative/medical prescription.

Next example illustrates non-literal meaning of a term:

„When I see people protest with national flags, it smells like ugly fascism to me.“

In European societies the word „fascism” denotes a clearly condemned category (and forbidden in many social situations). So this sentence does not denigrate „fascists” by attributing „ugly” to „fascism” (we can say that fascists are already denigrated per se).

On the other hand, a reading of this sentence renders a meaning that people carrying legal flags could be fascists. If those people are politically inclined to the right or traditionalists, they may freely wave the flags expressing their (legal) political views and not be denigrated as fascists. Hence, this sentence may be viewed as hate speech. Of course, this depends on the context as well.

In many cases of hate speech, non-literal meaning takes place. To accommodate this, the data model of our lexicon supports declaring which category is targeted by the occurring term in an example text.

Our Knowledge base contains apriori negative people groups (in society's view) which are not expected to be targets of hate speech.

For example, see the terms and text examples for the category „Nazism“. The texts in this lexicon are interpreted to be negative towards the adherents of Nazism, but they are not labeled as hate speech towards them, since the category of Nazism is already denigrated per se.

We believe it is important keep track of the categories of people condemned by a society (negative categories) because the terms used to address these people are often used to denigrate other groups of people. The above written utterance exhibits an example attributing „Fascism“ to „Nationalism“, although somewhat indirectly. Other more direct examples can be found quite easily.

Common patterns of metaphorical transfer of negativity from one group to another include sources like „Nazism“, „Fascism“, „Pedophilia“, „Mental disorder“, and others. This is a rich topic for further sociolinguistic research.

In a usual setting, one may not be interested to find disapproval towards „negative categories“ ranging from „Fascism“ to „Alcohol dependence“, especially after reading the definitions of hate speech published by the UN or Encyclopedia Britannica. On the other hand, we think that both structured manual text interpretation and automated natural language processing methods may strongly benefit from having these terms at disposal.

Knowledge base data models

The multilingual sentiment corpus constructed in this phase is a great starting point for the subsequent project steps (A3 Semiautomatic corpora construction and annotation, and A4 Dictionary construction).

Although machine learning (and deep learning) methods require larger datasets to create good quality models, the presented data can be effectively used in conjunction with other datasets and linguistic resources in order to yield first models which will help find larger sets of critical examples to be manually labelled by humans.

Moreover, per-case analysis of these sets will provide information on how to best structure the final sentiment classification schema, e.g. to answer the following questions:

- positive and negative categories dependent or independent
- single or multiple labels per document (e.g. primary and secondary)
- different modes of sentiment (e.g. associative and deductive)
- sentiment gradation (e.g. binary or multi-level sentiment)

The large set of extracted sentiment phrases is a very good resource for the enrichment of existing or construction new sentiment lexicons. Also, the extracted phrases may be used to automatically obtain a sentence-level sentiment corpus if it will be necessary for the final models.

The texts with non-matching label sets by different annotators will serve as good examples for decisions in complex situations.
